Part I: Expression (Items 1 – 10)
Choose the best answer.

Situation: Two friends are planning about their vacation.

Dora: Hi Luke. It's Dora. _____(1)_____ find any information about accommodation in Rome?
Luke: Hi, I was just going to call you. I've found some on the internet. There are quite a few hostels for backpackers there. The first possibility I found was a hostel called Rome Season.
Dora: That's cool. _____(2)_____
Luke: It's pretty cheap, you can get a bed in a dormitory for nineteen dollars per person. Private rooms cost a bit more, but we'll be OK in dormitories, won't we?
Dora: _____(3)_____
Luke: So that hostel has parking, though that_____(4)_____to us as we'll be using public transport.
Dora: Yeah. Are there any reviews on the website from people who've been there?
Luke: Well, yes. _____(5)_____ though. Some people said they didn't like the staff, they had an unfriendly attitude.
Dora: Mmm. That's quite unusual in a hostel, usually all the staff are really welcoming.
Luke: That's what I thought. People said they liked the pool, and the fact that the rooms had air-conditioning, but the problem with that it was very noisy, so they were kept awake. But it was too hot if they turned it off, so _____(6)_____.
Dora: Someone told me there's another hostel called Roma Rome something.
Luke: Roma Rome Lodge. It costs a bit more, forty-five dollars a person.
Dora: What?
Luke: Oh, no, that's for private rooms, it's twenty-three fifty for the dorms.
Dora: _____(7)_____.
Luke: It looks to be in quite a good location, a bit out of town and quiet but with good transport, and quite near a beach.
Dora: Has it got a pool?
Luke: Yes, and its own gardens. The reviews for that one are mostly OK except for one person who said they couldn't sleep because there were insects flying around in the dormitories.
Dora: _____(8)_____ then. And I'd rather be somewhere central really.
Luke: Right. There's a place called Duomo Lodge. They've got dorms at twenty-two dollars. And it's downtown, near all the restaurants and clubs and everything, _____(9)_____. On top of that, it doesn't close at night.
Dora: Superb, I am going to stay there_____(10)_____
Luke: Finally, we have a deal.

Non-fiction Story

An experienced and courageous adventurer, John Smith, was also a shameless self-promoter and a world-class liar, with a knack for getting into trouble. On the voyage over, for example, he was charged with mutiny, although he was eventually acquitted.

But whatever his faults, Smith was both gutsy and diplomatic. He managed to make friends with Powhatan, the chief of the local Native Americans, and the tribe provided the colonists with enough food to hold on. Smith provided much-needed leadership, declaring, "He that will not work neither shall he eat." Without Smith, the colony may not have survived.

Looking at Theatre History

One of the primary ways of approaching the Greek theatre is through archeology, the systematic study of material remains such as architecture, inscriptions, sculpture, vase painting, and other forms of decorative art. Serious on-site excavations began in Greece around 1870, but W. Dorpfeld did not begin the first extensive study of the Theatre of Dionysus until 1886. Since that time, more than 167 other Greek theatres have been identified and many of them have been excavated. Nevertheless, they still do not permit us to describe the precise appearance of the skene (illustrations printed in books are conjectural reconstructions), since many pieces are irrevocably lost because the buildings in later periods became sources of stone for other projects and what remains is usually broken and scattered. That most of the buildings were remodeled many times has created great problems for those seeking to date both the parts and the successive versions. Despite these drawbacks, archeology provides the most concrete evidence we have about the theatre structures of ancient Greece. But, if they have told us much, archeologists have not completed their work, and many sites have scarcely been touched.

Perhaps the most controversial use of archeological evidence in theatre history is vase paintings, thousands of which have survived from ancient Greece. (Most of those used by theatre scholars are produced in Margarete Bieber's The History of the Greek and Roman Theatre.) Depicting scenes from mythology and daily life, the vases are the most graphic pictorial evidence we have. But they are also easy to misinterpret. Some scholars have considered any vase that depicts a subject threatre in a surviving drama or any scene showing masks, flute players, or ceremonials to be valid evidence of theatrical practice. This is highly questionable assumption, since the Greeks made widespread use of masks, dances, and music outside the theatre and since the myths on which dramatists drew were known to everyone, including vase painters, who might well depict the same subjects as dramatists without being indebted to them. Those vases showing scenes unquestionably theatrical are few in number.

Written evidence about ancient Greek theatre is often treated as less reliable than archeological evidence because most written accounts are separated so far in time from the events they describe and because they provide no information about their own sources. Of the written evidence, the surviving manuscripts of Greek plays date from around the tenth century, C.E., some 1500 years after they were first performed. Since printing is not exist during this time span, copies of plays had to be made by hand, and therefore the possibility of textual errors creeping in was magnified. Nevertheless, the scripts offer us our readiest access to the cultural and theatrical conditions out of which they came. But these scripts, like other kinds of evidence, are subject to varying interpretations. Certainly performances embodied a male perspective, for example, since the plays were written, selected, staged, and acted by men. Yet the existing plays feature numerous choruses of women and many feature strong female characters. Because these characters often seem victims of their own powerlessness and appear to be governed, especially in the comedies, by sexual desire, some critics have seen these plays as rationalizations by the male-dominated culture for keeping women segregated and cloistered. Other critics, however, have seen in these same plays an attempt by male authors to force their male audiences to examine and call into question this segregation and cloistering of Athenian women.

By far the majority of written references to Greek theatre date from several hundred years after the events they report. The writers seldom mention their sources of evidence, and thus we do not know what credence to give them. In the absence of material nearer in time to the events, however, historians have used the accounts and have been grateful to have them. Overall, historical treatment of the Greek theatre is something like assembling a jigsaw puzzle from which many pieces are missing: historians arrange what they have and imagine (with the aid of the remaining evidence and logic) what has been lost. As a result, though the broad outlines of Greek theatre history are reasonably clear, many of the details remain open to doubt.

15. What can be inferred from paragraph 1 about the skene in theatre history?

1. Its popularity was decreased as of the ongoing problems.
2. Drawings in books are the only accurate visual records.
3. Not enough evidence is available to make a precise model.
4. Archaeologists have excavated a large number of them.
5. It was not identified or studied until the early 1800s.

16. What does the author state about the female characters in Greek theatre in paragraph 3?

1. They were mostly ignored by critics.
2. They had no featured parts in plays.
3. They played an important role.
4. They did not participate in the chorus.
5. They frequently played the part of victims.

17. Which of the following could best replace the word “precise” in the first paragraph?

1. Important
2. Reliable
3. Accepted
4. Recognizable
5. Unusual

18. According the third paragraph, scripts of plays may not be accurate because_____

1. Copies by hand may contain many errors.
2. The sources cited are not well known.
3. The writing is too complex to understand.
4. They are written in very old language.
5. The printing is difficult to read.

19. The word “them” in the fourth paragraph refers to_____

1. References
2. Writers
3. Materials
4. Sources
5. Events

Resources and Industrialism in Canada

While the much-anticipated expansion of the western frontier was unfolding in accordance with the design of the National Policy, a new northern frontier was opening up to enhance the prospects of Canadian industrial development. Long the preserve of the fur trade, the Canadian Shield and the western Cordilleras became a treasury of minerals, timber and hydroelectric power in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. As early as 1883, CPR (Canadian Pacific Railway) construction crews blasting through the rugged terrain of northern Ontario discovered copper and nickel deposits in the vicinity of Sudbury. As refining processes, uses, and markets for the metal developed, Sudbury became the world's largest nickel producer. The building of the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway led to the discovery of rich silver deposits around Cobalt north of Lake Nipissing in 1903 and touched off a mining boom that spread northward to Kirkland Lake and the Porcupine district. Although the economic importance of these mining operations was enduring, they did not capture the public imagination to the same extent as the Klondike gold rush of the late 1890s.

Fortune-seekers from all parts of the world flocked to the Klondike and Yukon River valleys to pan for gold starting in 1896. At the height of the gold rush in 1898, the previously unsettled subarctic frontier had a population of about 30,000, more than half of which was concentrated in the newly established town of Dawson. In the same year, the federal government created the Yukon Territory, administered by an appointed commissioner, in an effort to ward off the prospect of annexation to Alaska. Even if the economic significance of the Klonedike strike was somewhat exaggerated and short-lived, the tales of sudden riches, heroic and tragic exploits, and the rowdiness and lawlessness of the mining frontier were immortalized through popular fiction and folklore, notably the poetic verses of Robert W. Service.

Perhaps less romantic than the mining booms, the exploitation of forest and water resources was just as vital to national development. The Douglas fir, spruce, and cedar stands of British Columbia along with the white pine forests of Ontario satisfied construction demands on the treeless prairies as well as in the growing cities and towns of central Canada and The United States. British Columbia's forest also supplied lumber to asia. In addition, the softwood forest wealth of the Cordilleras and the Shield was a valuable source of pulpwood for the development of the pulp and paper industry, which made Canada one of the world's leading exporters of newsprint. Furthermore, the fast flowing rivers of the Shield and Cordilleras could readily be harnessed as sources of hydroelectric power, replacing coal in the booming factories of central Canada as well as in the evolving mining and pulp and paper industries. The age of electricity under public ownership and control was ushered in by the creation of the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission (now Ontario Hydro) in 1906 to distribute and eventually to produce this vital source of the energy.

Western settlement and the opening of the northern resource frontier stimulated industrial expansion, particularly in central Canada. As the national Policy had intended, a growing agricultural population in the West increased the demand for eastern manufactured goods, thereby giving rise to agricultural implements works, iron and steel foundries, machine shops, railway yards, textile mills, boot and shoe factories, and numerous smaller manufacturing enterprises that supplied consumer goods. By keeping out lower-priced foreign manufactured goods, the high tariff policies of the federal government received much credits for protecting existing industries and encouraging the creation of new enterprises. To climb the tariff wall, large American industrial firms opened branches in Canada, and the governments of Ontario and Quebec aggressively urged them on by offering bonuses, subsidies, and guarantees to locate new plants within their borders. Canadian industrial enterprises became increasingly attractive to foreign investors, especially from the United States and Great Britain. Much of the over $600 million of American capital that flowed into Canada from 1900 to 1913 was earmarked for mining and the pulp and paper industry, while British investors contributed near $1.8 billion, mostly in railway building business development, and the construction of urban infrastructure. As a result, the gross value of Canadian manufactured products quadrupled from 1891 to 1916.
